employment to thousands of mechanics of all

The West feeds both the South and the East-the former while she is raising the raw material of manufacture, and the latter while she is working it up. If the South, therefore, shall mainly abandon her peculiar cultivation, and go in the same line of production as the West, it is very evident that the price of agricultural productions must average very low. This view of the case has not escaped the attention of shrewd Western men, and one Republican paper in Cincinnati, not long ago, expressed the opinion that this war must be closed up before the South was forced into grain culture, or else the West would inevitably be bankrupt next year, if she had no market in that direction. To increase this apprehension is also now added the almost positive information that Europe will need little or none of our breadstuffs.

The future of the West is gloomy indeed. The farmers of that section are an industrious, enterprising class of men. A large majority were just getting fore handed in the world and would, with fair times, have soon been "Rats do not die on the premises." generally out of debt.
